Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: ...especially in the early and uncomplicated stage of the disease. In the symptomatic treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis almost any therapeutic agent may find rational employment at one time or another during its course of months and years. The limits of this paper forbid their consideration in detail, but so far as we may employ drug remedies, it means often that we are to choose between two evils, and we must, therefore, have good reason to believe that the benefits which experience justifies us in expecting will result, without incidental drug effects, which would prove in the end that our interference has done more harm than good. Upon such consideration rests the symptomatic treatment of all disease, and tuberculosis is no exception. Under the head of general management I should also speak of climatic treatment, which, of all our means, is one of the most important for the arrestment of phthisis. There is, however, nothing specific in climate any more than there is in water or food. Climate is everywhere, and the difference in the purity of the air or in its density, in dryness of the soil, or in temperature, are relative matters, between one locality and another. Clinical benefits result altogether from its influence upon nutrition; and in so far as elevation is also a factor, from its influence upon the circulation, the improvement of which is again a matter of better nutritive processes, both local and general. The employment of climate means that we seek pure air, as free as may be from micro-organisms, from dust and from deleterious emanations of decomposing organic matter; air which is sufficiently dry so that the functions of the skin are under most favorable conditions, in a locality which, by its elevation, improves the circulation, and at which...
